

Robert was casually riding through the countryside in his sweet ride, jamming out to the classic, Elvis Presley. He noticed some suspicious prints embedded on his marvelous track and screeched to a halt to further investigate. He was worried for the safety of his car and terrified to encounter this unknown beast, so naturally he turned around and ran all the way back to his town. The local militia office was where he ran straight to once he reached town, since he decided to report the unknown beast to them. The police would not be able to handle this dangerous beast. The local militia listen to the distressed townspeople and agree with him that they must locate this beast and eliminate him to ensure the town's safety. They began marching behind Robert at a reasonably quick pace to start the hunt. Unfortunately, during their march, Robert leads them through an expansive mud pit that completely engulfs their boots. Robert instantly regrets leading them through the pit and tries to fix the situation by commanding them all to remove their boots to get rid of all the mud. However, the local militia is now trekking through the countryside barefoot, so obviously the pace slows and everyone becomes extremely exhausted as the unknown beast is nowhere to be found. A fairly faint figure does appear in the distance though and Robert immediately begins sprinting towards the moving figure. He is incredibly embarrassed when the moving figure finally comes into view and it's simply an elephant trainer taking his elephant for a walk. Luckily, his car is only a couple steps away from him, so he rushes into his car without even thinking twice and continues on his ride through the countryside.